Insightful reviews

Jess: This is an alphabet book for children who have moved beyond "A is for apple" and are ready for "a is for seed – tomorrow's apple." Each page introduces a letter and an object that will turn into something else, such as "M is for caterpillar – tomorrow's moth." The illustrations are naturalistic and accompanied by clear, bold text, making this a good choice for a beginning reader or for children being introduced to how things grow and change and interested in identifying the before and after objects. Using prediction and identification could make this work well for a story time or a classroom as well as browsing for fun.

jacky: I really liked the unique concept of this book. Instead of A is for apple, its A is for seed, tomorrow's apple. Really more for kids who have the alphabet pretty much down. The illustrations weren't amazing, but okay. At story time, a few kids couldn't tell what the illustrations were of when they tried to guess the words.

(c) An excellent example of the illustrator's ability to show texture is in the illustration for the letter H. When the reader turns the page they immediately see the tightly wound balls of soft yarn. As their eyes leave that page and move to the next, they are presented with a hat that gives the appearance that it is fuzzy and fluffy because of the small stray brush strokes that seem to come off from the hat. Another example for the use of texture is the illustration for raisins. The illustrator uses different variations of brown in oblong shapes to show the shriveled appearance that raisins have.
